Thoughts on Government: Advanced ESL Classes

1. Why do people have a government?
<ol> <li>What should a government do for people?</li> <li>What should be the powers of a government?</li> <li>What should a government not do?</li> <li>What are our rights as individuals?</li> </ol>
<ol> <li>Can you think of a situation when the population might not accept the principles and values of a government?</li> <li>In that case, what might happen?</li> </ol>
<ol> <li>How does the government choose people in positions of power?</li> <li>How are people chosen to be in the armed forces?</li> <li>How does the government take care of the basic needs of the people, or does it?</li> <li>What are the smaller structures of government such as towns and what are the larger national structures? How do they relate to each other?</li> <li>What kinds of power do the police and the courts have? How do they livicsonline or but their duties?</li> </ol>

 Trust by the population in each other and those who develop and carry out the organizational structure

The population has to trust in the good intentions of the government and the people in it.

They cannot be divided into antagonist groups.

They also have to trust that, if elected officials become corrupt, there is a mechanism to remove them.

- 1. Is the whole country unified or does one group have power?
- 2. What happens if someone in the government is corrupt?
- 3. How does the government change? Does the population have any control over the change process?

Discuss students' opinions.

Bring up a natural disaster such as a hurricane or a massive forest fire. Ask the class to think what happens if these statements are representative of the country. Then consider what happens if they are not.

Students may bring up specific situations either in their home countries or in the United States where the government has had to respond to a natural disaster or crucial political situation.

Bring the discussion to the development of a Constitution -- the difficulties in developing one and how a successful Constitution answers these questions leading to a calm, cohesive, and effective government.
